In a segregated neighborhood, Wiggins receives less pay because she toils alongside African Americans. However, a union begins to organize, and Wiggins makes the decision to join, causing a permanent change for her and her children.

Wiley Cash, the author of the novel, which is his third to be released, said he was inspired to tell Wiggins’ story because tales like hers often go untold.

“This was a story that wasn’t taught in the schools where I grew up,” he said. “It is an important story and the foundational moments of American labor history and it happened in my hometown and I didn’t know it.”

Inspired by the true events of Wiggins, Cash derived the story from Gastonia, North Carolina, his hometown, but also where his parents and other relatives...
ROCK THE SWAMP
continued from page 1
nontraditional senior majoring in Criminal Justice, who said she also hopes the tradition expands.

Lockett will also be receiving her ring, and explained how both graduating from UL Lafayette and obtaining her ring are important to her and her children. “It’s just a feeling that you can’t describe.”

At the end of the ceremony, Bowie loaded the rings into a custom-made canoe. Members of the ROTC pushed the canoe and rings into the swamp where it will float around overnight. The alligators and ROTC members guarded the rings until Tuesday, when they were retrieved and prepared for the ring ceremony that evening.

BALLAD
continued from page 1
worked in textile mills.

Cash said the purpose of the novel was partially so he could “learn more about it by writing about it.”

“What I didn’t know,” Cash added, “was how dangerous it was, how dirty it was and I didn’t know how low the pay was. I didn’t know people were literally dying because they couldn’t earn a living wage inside of the mills.”

Marcia Gaudet, professor emerita, served as head of the UL Lafayette English department when Cash was attending graduate school for his doctorate. She also served on Cash’s dissertation committee.

Gaudet said, at the time, Cash was interested in African American literature. Together with Reggie Young, another professor emeritus of UL Lafayette, he worked on a book about Ernest J. Gaines.

“With Wiley, many of us thought he had great promise as a writer, but it’s very rare that one of, or any young writer, gets that kind of reputation and critical acclaim early in his career. That’s something for UL to be proud of also,” Gaudet said.

Cash presented the first draft of what would be his debut novel, “A Land More Kind Than Home,” as his dissertation, having attended Ernest J. Gaines’ last class while he served as writer-in-residence in 2003.

Cash said he had the chance to “become friends with and study under a professional writer.”

“With Ernest Gaines,” Gaudet said, “he’s always said he wanted to give the people and places that he always knew a voice.”

Asked how Gaines changed his perspective, Cash said, “Once I read his stories I thought, my gosh, these people can’t live anywhere else but south Louisiana. Maybe I should try writing about people who can’t live anywhere but northwestern North Carolina.”

With “The Last Ballad” set in 1929, Cash was asked how his work might address the burden of Southern history. Cash said because much of the story focuses on violent actions against communities of African Americans and women, the subject matter is “exactly what we see happening today.”

By writing about the area, Cash said he attempts “to make the local experience speak to the universal experience.”

“Got a really strong review in the New York Times Book Review,” Gaudet said. “That in itself is an amazing accomplishment for any writer, particularly one who is relatively young.”

Gaudet said she hopes Cash will be back at the Ernest J. Gaines center to do a reading, as he has done before. She added that Cash remains in touch with all the friends he’s made at UL Lafayette and the surrounding area.

Cash currently serves as writer-in-residence for the University of North Carolina at Asheville. He said he still reserves a place for UL Lafayette, however.

“I definitely miss the food, and how friendly the town was, and the campus,” Cash said.

GLASCO
continued from page 2
females who are ready to go out into the workplace when they leave college.”

Glasco added “challenge and opportunity,” as well as maintaining the momentum set in place by current athletes and recent alumnae, is what made him decide to come to UL Lafayette.

“Being able to coach in front of these enthusiastic supporters of the program is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for a coach,” he said.