Atchafalaya Basin Council Council Works To Preserve Swamp

By BUCKY ALLEN
Advertiser Staff Reporter

Atchafalaya Basin has been the source of livelihood and recreation for Acadians living in and around the great swamp. And, as the basin has grown, it has become a place of national and international significance.

The basin has been the focus of the Atchafalaya Basin Council, which has worked to preserve the swamp for future generations. The council has received the support of the national and international community, including the federal government, conservation organizations, and local residents.

The council's main objective is to protect and preserve the Atchafalaya Basin as a national park, with the goal of making it a place where people can come to live, work, and recreate. The council has been successful in its efforts, with the basin receiving national recognition and designation.

In the future, the Atchafalaya Basin Council will continue to work to preserve the basin, with the goal of making it a place where people can come to live, work, and recreate. The council will continue to work with the federal government, conservation organizations, and local residents to ensure the protection and preservation of the basin.

The Atchafalaya Basin Council is an organization composed of representatives from the 13 parishes surrounding the basin. The council aims to protect and preserve the basin for the enjoyment of all people.

The council's most recent project has been the preservation of the Atchafalaya Basin as a national park. The council has been successful in its efforts, with the basin receiving national recognition and designation.

The Atchafalaya Basin Council is an organization composed of representatives from the 13 parishes surrounding the basin. The council aims to protect and preserve the basin for the enjoyment of all people.

The Atchafalaya Basin Council is an organization composed of representatives from the 13 parishes surrounding the basin. The council aims to protect and preserve the basin for the enjoyment of all people.