CAJUN COUNTRY

Their Unchanged Eden, After Nearly 200 Years It's Beginning to Change

In Lafourche Parish

This year it's clear, in 1936, when the Louisiana legislature moved to prohibit the sale of liquor in the parishes, the Cajuns were the last to respond. They had, in fact, been struggling to keep the influence of the liquor business within the confines of the Lafourche Parish. The wetlands of the parish, the area of the parish where the Cajuns are, have been the source of their livelihood for centuries. It is here that the Cajuns have traditionally lived, worked and played. They have been able to sustain their way of life by following the land and its resources, and it is this natural environment that has allowed them to maintain their way of life. The wetlands are vital to the Cajuns, providing them with the resources they need to survive. This year, the state of Louisiana has made a commitment to protect these resources and ensure that the Cajuns can continue to live in their Eden.

The state of Louisiana has made a commitment to protect these resources and ensure that the Cajuns can continue to live in their Eden. In order to do this, the state has taken steps to protect the wetlands and the Cajuns who live there. This includes setting aside land for the Cajuns to use and regulate the use of the land. The state has also established a system of wetland protection and management to ensure that the wetlands are protected for future generations. This is an important step in protecting the Cajuns and their way of life.

The Cajuns have been able to sustain their way of life by following the land and its resources, and it is this natural environment that has allowed them to maintain their way of life. The wetlands are vital to the Cajuns, providing them with the resources they need to survive. This year, the state of Louisiana has made a commitment to protect these resources and ensure that the Cajuns can continue to live in their Eden. In order to do this, the state has taken steps to protect the wetlands and the Cajuns who live there. This includes setting aside land for the Cajuns to use and regulate the use of the land. The state has also established a system of wetland protection and management to ensure that the wetlands are protected for future generations. This is an important step in protecting the Cajuns and their way of life.