Southern warned it could lose accreditation School docked for missing benchmarks in several categories

BY REBEKAH ALLEN
ral@students.com

Southern University was warned this month it could lose accreditation for the school to offer degrees and receive federal funds. The Southern Association of Colleges and Schools\nCommision on Colleges and\nSchools approved the warning during its annual meeting in August. The university was placed on probation as a result of the decision. Southern was warned in February 2007 that it was in danger of losing accreditation if it did not address several critical issues. Since then, the school has made progress in several areas, but there are still concerns about the overall quality of education.

An Accreditation Council for Regional Universities and\nSchools official said the warning was based on data from the school’s self-study report and other sources. The council noted that the university had made progress in some areas, but there were still
challenges to overcome.

The university was warned in February 2007 that it was in danger of losing
accreditation if it did not
address several critical
issues. Since then, the school
has made progress in several
areas, but there are still
concerns about the overall
quality of education.

An Accreditation Council for
Regional Universities and\nSchools official said the
warning was based on data from
the school’s self-study report
and other sources. The council
noted that the university had
made progress in some areas,
but there were still
challenges to overcome.

The university was warned
in February 2007 that it was
in danger of losing
accreditation if it did not
address several critical
issues. Since then, the school
has made progress in several
areas, but there are still
concerns about the overall
quality of education.

An Accreditation Council for
Regional Universities and\nSchools official said the
warning was based on data from
the school’s self-study report
and other sources. The council
noted that the university had
made progress in some areas,
but there were still
challenges to overcome.

The university was warned
in February 2007 that it was
in danger of losing
accreditation if it did not
address several critical
issues. Since then, the school
has made progress in several
areas, but there are still
concerns about the overall
quality of education.

An Accreditation Council for
Regional Universities and\nSchools official said the
warning was based on data from
the school’s self-study report
and other sources. The council
noted that the university had
made progress in some areas,
but there were still
challenges to overcome.

The university was warned
in February 2007 that it was
in danger of losing
accreditation if it did not
address several critical
issues. Since then, the school
has made progress in several
areas, but there are still
concerns about the overall
quality of education.

An Accreditation Council for
Regional Universities and\nSchools official said the
warning was based on data from
the school’s self-study report
and other sources. The council
noted that the university had
made progress in some areas,
but there were still
challenges to overcome.

The university was warned
in February 2007 that it was
in danger of losing
accreditation if it did not
address several critical
issues. Since then, the school
has made progress in several
areas, but there are still
concerns about the overall
quality of education.

An Accreditation Council for
Regional Universities and\nSchools official said the
warning was based on data from
the school’s self-study report
and other sources. The council
noted that the university had
made progress in some areas,
but there were still
challenges to overcome.

The university was warned
in February 2007 that it was
in danger of losing
accreditation if it did not
address several critical
issues. Since then, the school
has made progress in several
areas, but there are still
concerns about the overall
quality of education.