Most Metro Council members said Wednesday they disagree with the Justice Department's assessment of reapportionment and merger plans.

Mayor Pro Tem Mike Roubique called the rejection of the merger "out of order." "We didn't submit that to them. If one or two people in Washington can tell us what to do when the voters approved it, it's not very democratic," Roubique said.

The local government is required to submit any reapportionment plan to the Justice Department but local officials said they are not required and did not seek approval of the Justice Department on consolidation of the councils.

But Justice Department officials Thursday said the reapportionment plan to the Justice Department but local officials said they are not required and did not seek approval of the Justice Department on consolidation of the councils.

By MIKEDUNNE

Most Metro Council members said Wednesday they disagree with the Justice Department's assessment of reapportionment and merger plans.

Mayor Pro Tem Mike Roubique called the rejection of the merger "out of order." "We didn't submit that to them. If one or two people in Washington can tell us what to do when the voters approved it, it's not very democratic," Roubique said.

The local government is required to submit any reapportionment plan to the Justice Department but local officials said they are not required and did not seek approval of the Justice Department on consolidation of the councils.

But Justice Department officials Thursday said the reapportionment plan to the Justice Department but local officials said they are not required and did not seek approval of the Justice Department on consolidation of the councils.

By MIKEDUNNE

Most Metro Council members said Wednesday they disagree with the Justice Department's assessment of reapportionment and merger plans.

Mayor Pro Tem Mike Roubique called the rejection of the merger "out of order." "We didn't submit that to them. If one or two people in Washington can tell us what to do when the voters approved it, it's not very democratic," Roubique said.

The local government is required to submit any reapportionment plan to the Justice Department but local officials said they are not required and did not seek approval of the Justice Department on consolidation of the councils.

But Justice Department officials Thursday said the reapportionment plan to the Justice Department but local officials said they are not required and did not seek approval of the Justice Department on consolidation of the councils.

By MIKEDUNNE

Most Metro Council members said Wednesday they disagree with the Justice Department's assessment of reapportionment and merger plans.

Mayor Pro Tem Mike Roubique called the rejection of the merger "out of order." "We didn't submit that to them. If one or two people in Washington can tell us what to do when the voters approved it, it's not very democratic," Roubique said.

The local government is required to submit any reapportionment plan to the Justice Department but local officials said they are not required and did not seek approval of the Justice Department on consolidation of the councils.