Superiors also may have made Advocate.

statement listing the reasons for his opinion of one employee who reviewed findings.

facts or opinions to contradict Kwan's spokesman John Wilson said Reynolds direct comment. Justice Department congressional elections.

that are deemed unfair to minorities.

Reynolds could not be reached for direct comment. Justice Department staff attorney Robert Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was Motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was motivated by a desire to preserve the integrity of existing boundary lines, particularly the district of U.S. Rep. Bob Livingston of New Orleans, a fellow Republican.

The plan creating a majority black district would have relocated most of Livingston's district, giving him about 80 percent new constituents.

This Governor, though he initially downplayed his role for whatever reasons, had the central role in the reapportionment process.

"He proposed his own reapportionment bills, used his veto power to achieve a desired objective and did not allow the enactment of a final plan unless it met his requirements."

Kwan said Treen's motivation is crucial to the case.

The report includes a summary of Treen's involvement with the long-defunct States' Rights Party, ostensibly organized to fight federal intervention in state affairs. Many of the party's members were leaders in the fight to maintain segregation of the races in the early 1960s, Kwan said.

Kwan noted that Treen, in his authorized biography, said he was disturbed by the racist tag on the States' Rights Party because he has always believed that all man are created equal.

"It is difficult to reconcile these beliefs with his prominent leadership in this party," Kwan wrote.

Kwan said persons objecting to the congressional plan submitted old flyers listing Treen as a speaker at a "Rally to Save Segregation." During the trial on the lawsuit, Treen said his involvement in the reapportionment process was moti...