French writer visits USL

Nicole Barnhelm, a French writer on sociological problems and spokesman for minority groups, was a visitor on the USL campus last Monday and Tuesday, meeting with USL students, faculty members, and administrators.

Miss Barnhelm, a writer for the French newspaper, "Le Monde," is traveling in the U.S. as a guest of the U.S. Department of State. After speaking with students and teachers in French, Miss Barnhelm commented on the amount of French being spoken in this area. Miss Barnhelm, who speaks English fluently, was a Fulbright scholar in this country some 20 years ago.

Migrant problems

Miss Barnhelm spoke of the problem France is having now with some three million migrants to that country from underdeveloped countries and the need to provide them with job training and the means to integrate with the life patterns of peoples of France.

Before returning to France, she hopes to talk with teachers in Schools of Social Welfare to discover what is being done in this country with similar problems.

FRENCH NEWSPAPER WOMAN VISITS USL—Miss Nicole Barnhelm, writer for the Paris newspaper, "Le Monde," visited the USL campus last Tuesday and was impressed with the number of people and students who speak French in this area. At a meeting with students and faculty at La Maison Academique Francaise on the USL campus were, from left, Richard Goldry, president of the USL's Le Cercle Francais; Martine Toury, Paris, France, an exchange student and teacher of conversational French; Dr. Clyde L. Rougeau, USL president; and Miss Nicole Barnhelm, a writer of sociological news stories and a spokesman for minority groups.
