Fabulous Jefferson Island is The Salt of The Earth

The Salt of The Earth

Jefferson Island is a small unincorporated community located on Cape Fear in Brunswick County, North Carolina. It is known for its salt production, especially in the early 20th century, when it was a major source of salt for the region. The island has a rich history that includes its role as a Union fort during the Civil War and as a center for the salt industry. Today, it is a popular destination for visitors interested in its history and natural beauty.

The Salt Production

Salt was produced on Jefferson Island using a traditional method that involved harvesting saltwater from the Atlantic Ocean and evaporating it in the sun. The resulting salt was then collected and used for various purposes, including food preservation and industrial applications.

History of Jefferson Island

The island was inhabited by Native Americans for thousands of years before European settlers arrived. In the early 19th century, it became a center for salt production, and many families lived on the island, working in the salt industry. The island was also a strategic location during the Civil War, when it was occupied by Union forces.

Today, Jefferson Island is a protected natural area, and its salt flats are considered a valuable resource. Visitors can explore the island's history and enjoy its natural beauty, including its beaches and wildlife.
