MADD education for drunk driving

Drunk drivers killed more than 600 people in Louisiana last year, according to the Louisiana State Police. Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD) said "laws to control the carnage are not enough. We must begin to address the root cause." Mothers Against Drunk Driving has been working to bring attention to the issue of drunk driving and the consequences of it.

The Jeannerette Enterprise, Jeannerette, La. Wednesday, October 27, 1982—Pg. 7

Drunk drivers killed more than 600 people in Louisiana last year, according to the Louisiana State Police. Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD) said "laws to control the carnage are not enough. We must begin to address the root cause." Mothers Against Drunk Driving has been working to bring attention to the issue of drunk driving and the consequences of it.

"MADD wants people to be completely informed about what the intent of the law is. It's up to each citizen to see that their local officials carry out the law as it is written," says Dr. Brandt, "One of our biggest problems is the inconsistency of enforcement, prosecution, and adjudication."

Drunk drivers killed more than 600 people in Louisiana last year, according to the Louisiana State Police. Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD) said "laws to control the carnage are not enough. We must begin to address the root cause." Mothers Against Drunk Driving has been working to bring attention to the issue of drunk driving and the consequences of it.

"MADD wants people to be completely informed about what the intent of the law is. It's up to each citizen to see that their local officials carry out the law as it is written," says Dr. Brandt, "One of our biggest problems is the inconsistency of enforcement, prosecution, and adjudication."