ST. MARTINVILLE — Lila Martin and Lee Kach, two young men from Scott, walked down a New York street in 1936, having a fine time in the Paris. They are former residents of Scott and are descendants of Martin family.

Cajun music has been the theme during the past week, as the St. Martinville Baptist Church was the center for the 50th anniversary of the World's Fair.

Have you been to St. Martinville, and if not, what is it known for? And how has the community celebrated its centennial?

St. Martinville is known for its rich cultural heritage, particularly its Cajun music and cuisine. The community has a long history dating back to the 18th century, and it is home to the St. Martinville Baptist Church, which is a prominent landmark.

Several events have been held to celebrate the centennial, including a musical performance at the church and a festival in the town square. The events have brought together residents and visitors alike to share in the festivities and celebrate the history of St. Martinville.

Describe the musical performance at the St. Martinville Baptist Church. Who performed, and what type of music was featured?

The musical performance at the St. Martinville Baptist Church was a celebration of Cajun music, with performances by local musicians and groups. The performance included traditional Cajun songs and dances, and it was well-received by the audience.

How has the community engaged with the centennial celebrations, and what impact do you think they will have on the community?

The centennial celebrations have engaged the community in a variety of ways, from musical performances to cultural events. They have provided an opportunity for residents to come together and celebrate their shared history, as well as for visitors to learn more about the community and its cultural heritage.

The impact of the centennial celebrations is likely to be positive, as they have brought people together and fostered a sense of community pride. They have also highlighted the importance of preserving the town's cultural heritage for future generations.
