A staff writer for the New York Times has prepared a feature article about Acadiana and publication is expected towards the end of this week. It focuses on the problem of French-language survival in Louisiana. The writer was accompanied by a photographer, and the team visited a wide range of homes and places of public life and entertainment in Acadiana.

This region was also visited recently by a group of five media workers from Radio diffusion Francais, the French television network. They sought materials on the racial situation in the U.S. The group decided to film in Acadiana because of the unique opportunity to film interviews in French without the need for translation.