Many crowded fervently with undersized signs that sheltered their condemnations of abortion and a few doubled as torn-up sheets of pro-life correspondence. A few held pictures of infants and the aborted. A few, barely audible, held large portraits of the aborted.

Many attended around 7 a.m. when abortion would begin and were scattered throughout the building.

Pre-life activists began the annual event of what is called the march for life in the Washington, D.C., area. The event started at 6 a.m. at the White House and ended at the Supreme Court.

The pro-life activists were seen carrying signs that said "Abortion is murder," "Abortion is wrong," and "Abortion is a sin.

Members of the crowd represented various anti-abortion groups, including the National Right to Life Committee, the American Society for the Prevention of Abortion, and the National Organization for Women.

As the crowd gathered, they listened to speakers from various organizations, including Dr. Mildred Jefferson, who is a member of the pro-life movement.

The protesters chanted slogans such as "Abortion is murder," "Abortion is wrong," and "Abortion is a sin." They also held up signs with pro-life messages.

The protest lasted for several hours, and the crowd remained silent, except for the occasional chant of pro-life slogans.

At the end of the protest, the crowd dispersed, leaving the area where the protest was held. The street was cleaned up, and the area was returned to its normal state.

The protest was attended by hundreds of people, and it was a peaceful protest, with no incidents or disturbances reported.

The protest was organized by the National Right to Life Committee, and it was held on the grounds of the Supreme Court in Washington, D.C.

The protest was in response to the Supreme Court's decision in Roe v. Wade, which legalized abortion in 1973.

The protest was supported by various anti-abortion groups, including the National Right to Life Committee, the American Society for the Prevention of Abortion, and the National Organization for Women.

The protest was organized to raise awareness about the issue of abortion and to promote the pro-life movement.

The protest was peaceful, and there were no incidents or disturbances reported. The area was returned to its normal state after the protest ended.
