Rain adds authenticity to Festivals Acadiens

by Brit Blockeneder

Some people say if you don't like the weather in Southern Louisiana, it will change. Literally, that's just what happened at this year's Festivals Acadiens, and visitors and the rain couldn't have come at a better or more opportune time. Festivals Acadiens, organized by the Cajun and Creole Music Society, included performances by Achille Chatelain, Tony Guidry, with traditional dance and music, helped bring the Louisiana culture to the forefront.

The rain not only made the experience even better, but also added a new dimension to the festival. Musicians took to the stage in the rain, playing on and sans umbrella, adding a unique and authentic touch to the event. The festival included traditional Cajun and Creole music, dance, and food, all of which are traditional to the Acadiana region.

The rain also provided a backdrop for the festival's array of musical acts, including Achille Chatelain and Tony Guidry, who performed in the rain, adding an extra layer of excitement and engagement for the audience. Despite the weather, the festival continued on, with music and dance filling the air. Attendees danced in the rain, soaking up the atmosphere and the music.

The rain added a special flair to the festival, making it an experience that will be remembered for years to come. The Acadiana community came together, despite the weather, to celebrate their culture and traditions. The rain was not a hindrance, but rather a part of the festival's charm, enhancing the authentic experience of Festivals Acadiens.
