Perpetuates Acadian Handicraft

BY ANNA LOIS DASPIT

In a picturesque setting, on a gently sloping lawn, with graceful trees throwing their shade over the building, stands in St. Martinville, Louisiana, the farm house built by the descendants of the first Acadians. The home is a replica of the home built by the Acadians in the mid-18th century, and it is the only remaining replica of that era in the state of Louisiana.

The farm house is a living museum, and it is open to the public. Visitors can see the many artifacts and items that were used by the Acadians in their daily lives. The house is also a working farm, and visitors can see the crops being grown and the livestock being taken care of.

The Acadians were a group of French-speaking people who arrived in North America in the mid-18th century. They settled in Louisiana and Mississippi, and they brought with them their own unique culture and way of life. The Acadians were known for their hard work and their love of the land, and they became some of the earliest farmers and settlers in the region.

Today, the farm house in St. Martinville is a reminder of the rich history of the Acadian people in Louisiana. It is a place where people can come to learn about the past and to experience the culture of the Acadians firsthand.

The farm house is located in St. Martinville, Louisiana, and it is open to the public. Visitors can take a guided tour of the house and learn about the Acadian way of life. It is a must-see destination for anyone interested in Louisiana history and culture.
