Medicine
And the PATIENTS RIGHTS

BENJAMIN BUCKNER

Today in America, we are healthier and we live longer. And people in general are more health conscious — eating better, smoking less, exercising, more and smoking, less. At the same time, the face of the country is changing. In the workplace, technological advances and advances in medicine continue to challenge health professionals with new ways to handle stress and stroke.

Medicine, in the forefront of the high tech revolution, is an important part of the modern health care system, and yet our attitudes at times reflect a more humanized, less mechanistic regard for our doctors. Today we are less likely to blindly follow their advice. We are asking for more information concerning treatments, and we are much more likely to demand an explanation of what those treatments will consist of. The relationship between doctors and patients approaches a joint partnership more than ever before.

There is also a new emphasis, according to many doctors, on the patient as a person rather than just a statistic, disease or troubled organ. For one thing, the hospital environment, the frightening atmosphere, is changing to be more comfortable and personal.

In 1970, the occupancy rate of American hospitals was at its peak. But today, the occupancy rate is down 20 percent. The number of uninsured people is up 40 percent.

Don't Just Fight Cavities...Fight Tartar

The patented Colgate Tartar Protection toothpaste can give you a 4.5 times more effective than brushing alone in fighting tartar build-up longer than any other toothpaste. So don't be discouraged if your teeth still look yellow or brown. Tartar looks yellow or brown because this hard build-up of plaque and bacteria cannot always be removed by brushing alone. Tartar forms around the gum line on many adults' teeth. According to a recent report, about one in five U.S. adults have some tartar on their teeth. The best way to remove tartar is to travel to your dentist. Tartar can be removed easily. But don't be curt and abrupt. The Need For Scientific Knowledge Grows

Science teachers help make our lives better by teaching the next generation how to improve their lives. Educators are increasingly asked to teach science and technology in schools throughout the nation. As a consequence, science teachers must be well-prepared to meet the challenges of teaching science and technology.

A National Academy of Sciences study discovered that only half of America's high school seniors and only one third of its juniors take science classes.

Points for Parents

Drugs

Drugs have a common "converse-ting" feature to which children are susceptible. Mrs. Anna A. McGlone, head of the Family Service Center in Cullman, became an active volunteer with the Fund in 1972 after her brother committed suicide.

School Boards Rat To Task Force on Control Over Local Students

What disciplinary actions should school boards take when students use computers on school property? What are the responsibilities of students and teachers in the computer age? These issues are discussed in a new report by the National Education Association.

The problem some students have in accessing the Internet during a school day is that they may be using their personal computers at home. To help students and teachers, the report recommended that schools and teachers develop a policy for the use of personal computers.

Kids can learn when they have a protein diet. This is important because it's necessary for their growth and development. They need to be interested in their studies and their classmates. It's important to understand that they're learning from their classmates.

Caring For Your Ears

Many Americans are glad that their ears are in better shape today than in the past. This is due in large part to the development of new hearing aids and the increased availability of quality care for hearing loss. However, it's important to remember that hearing loss can still occur in people of all ages.
