People

ON RAISING KIDS

SYLVA RIMM

Sibling rivalry root of problem

DEAR DR. STRAUS: It seems quite unfair that my six-year-old boy is so worried about the rivalry he feels with his three-year-old sister. It seems unreasonable that a six-year-old boy should worry about his younger sister. It seems to me that it is not fair that he feels so guilty about it.

DEAR DR. STRAUS: We have two children, a boy and a girl. Our boy is very smart and is very difficult to raise. He tends to be very difficult to discipline. His younger sister is much easier to discipline. She is very obedient and does everything she is told. Our boy, on the other hand, is always fighting with his sister and is very irritable. It seems unfair that he should have to put up with his sister's behavior.

DEAR DR. STRAUS: Our adopted son is very difficult to discipline. He has been successively disciplined by professionals to be at least a two-year-old developmentally. A new language may be part of his language development delay, but he is now developing a new language. He is learning to talk, to follow rules, to play games with his siblings, and to follow instructions. He is slowly developing a new language.

DEAR DR. STRAUS: Our four-year-old daughter is very difficult to discipline. She is very smart and is very difficult to discipline. She is very obedient and does everything she is told. Our son, on the other hand, is always fighting with his siblings and is very irritable. It seems unfair that he should have to put up with his sister's behavior.

DEAR DR. STRAUS: We have two children, a boy and a girl. Our boy is very smart and is very difficult to raise. He tends to be very difficult to discipline. His younger sister is much easier to discipline. She is very obedient and does everything she is told. Our boy, on the other hand, is always fighting with his sister and is very irritable. It seems unfair that he should have to put up with his sister's behavior.

DEAR DR. STRAUS: Our adopted son is very difficult to discipline. He has been successively disciplined by professionals to be at least a two-year-old developmentally. A new language may be part of his language development delay, but he is now developing a new language. He is learning to talk, to follow rules, to play games with his siblings, and to follow instructions. He is slowly developing a new language.

DEAR DR. STRAUS: Our four-year-old daughter is very difficult to discipline. She is very smart and is very difficult to discipline. She is very obedient and does everything she is told. Our son, on the other hand, is always fighting with his siblings and is very irritable. It seems unfair that he should have to put up with his sister's behavior.