USL Professor Helping Archaeological Team

Since June 15, some 16 Latino students, together with the large shell midden known as the "LSUNO Shells," have been working on the site at the University of Southeastern Louisiana. The site is located about a mile east of the LSU campus, and it was discovered by an archaeologist named J. Richard Shenkel, who is studying the site as part of his dissertation for the University of Louisiana at Baton Rouge.

In this test pit, the different strata are clearly marked. The students are going through the shell and dirt checking for artifacts.

In this test pit, the different strata are clearly marked. The students are going through the shell and dirt checking for artifacts.